That is, the person who will deliver votes. This election season, political pundits are also talking about "the economy" as a candidate. Everyone believes that the economy will decide who will be the next president. Those pundits aren't as smart as they think. Economics is not about the economy. It's about human behavior. There is no doubt that economic decisions do effect human behavior. But there is no direct relationship, just as there is no direct relationship between what happens to the economy and what people do. When it comes to economics, humans are not rational. Economic decisions are generally made by people acting based on the emotional and psychological impulses of self-interest. The market, like everything else in human society, is built on the irrational, the driven by emotion, the impatient, the greedy, the exploitive. Economic self-interest only matters when it is combined with other factors that our behavior is not entirely controlled by the strong emotion of self-interest. We care about what is happening to others, we care about our relationships, we care about our family, we care about what we want to accomplish in life. Economics is primarily human behavior, and no economic law can make that behavior predictable and controllable. At best, economic incentives can, at the aggregate level, encourage what is rational and what is not. It's been interesting, listening to the candidates this season, what they say about the economy. The Republican candidates are promising more tax cuts. Fiscal conservative candidates like Rick Perry and Mitt Romney are all about cutting taxes to stimulate economic growth. The Obama campaign is arguing for "more government". They're arguing that the next president should "create jobs," build "green energy", cut taxes on the rich, and provide more government services. It's all about the economy for them. But this is no different than what we have heard from Democrats for decades. If it were not for a few interventionist policies that advanced the interests of some during the Reagan years, there would have been no big boom in
