When it comes to direct response advertising, a website must track visitors who take an action on a website. For example, a user may open a web page for a product of interest and then order that product. This type of transaction is commonly referred to as a "conversion" since the conversion of the visitor to a customer generates revenue for the web site. A web site owner is able to track such a conversion by tracking the user's browser activity. Cookies are typically used to track a user's browser activity. A cookie is a small text file that is stored on the user's machine and temporarily sends information back to the web server during subsequent visits. A user's cookie contains at least one unique identifier. Using the unique identifier, a web site can correlate past transactions and associate the corresponding cookie with the user. However, because cookies are static, they are not able to track the user's subsequent activity or visit to other web sites. Further, cookies are not able to associate multiple cookies with a single user. Previously, the following methods have been employed to generate and store unique identifiers and correlate the unique identifiers to a particular user: (a) using time-based unique identifiers such as session
