A redox and biomimetic approach to 1,2-dihydro-1,2-dimethoxy-4-methyl-6-oxo-2H-pyran-3-carbonitrile: synthesis and biological activity. The first preparative synthesis of 1,2-dihydro-1,2-dimethoxy-4-methyl-6-oxo-2H-pyran-3-carbonitrile, a new pyranoxanilide-type antitumor agent, and an accompanying biological assay are reported. Key features include an easily accessible aldol-dienone "tandem process" and a biomimetic dienone oxidation. Assessing the present and future needs of U.S. radiation therapy facilities. The recent completion of comprehensive facility surveys for three-quarters of the nation's radiation therapy facilities shows that a very high percentage (over 90%) of institutions are satisfied with their facilities. Analysis of the distribution of the problems reported by the facilities in the survey offers the opportunity to look ahead to predict the future needs for radiation therapy facilities. The problems identified are falling into three major categories: (1) types of resources needed, (2) educational programs, and (3) physical plant. In general, the more recently established facilities in the nation are not in need of additional space to enhance the volume or improve the quality of their services. However, given the current demographics of the patient mix in radiation therapy, there is a need for additional facilities to be able to provide services to an additional 20,000 patients in underrepresented minority populations per year. Education programs at the graduate and professional level in radiation therapy are necessary in order to meet the increasing educational demands of current

The study, which began in 2008, had been in limbo for eight years, spending a total of $1.3 billion, but the NIH's Office of Extramural Research abruptly announced Tuesday that it was suspending the study, effectively killing it. "They pulled the plug," said Dana Perls of the Partnership for Addiction Recovery, an advocacy group that was among the groups that submitted a letter to the NIH in support of the study. "That's incredible." The study, conducted by the National Institutes of Health's Cancer Institute, was a joint effort with the National Institute on Drug Abuse. Though the study was being led by the National Cancer Institute, the two institutions are separate. It was intended to evaluate the potential of a class of cannabinoids, the chemical compounds that are often found in marijuana and other botanical substances, in treating patients with various cancers. In 2010, the study received preliminary approval from the NIH's Office of Human Subjects Research. In the intervening years, the study received no additional approvals, putting it far behind in the race of other studies, including one backed by the National Cancer Institute, with which it had been vying. The results of the study have already been published in the journal Cancer, and they are not all that encouraging. Patients who received a cannabinoid compound, delta-9-tetrahydrocannabinol (THC), reported a moderate improvement in nausea and vomiting associated with cancer treatment, and a reduction in pain. Their appetite was moderately improved in one study; in a separate study, their appetite improved. 3e33713323
