Q: Is there a commercial airline that uses a "Lysander" type airplane? I am interested in learning more about the history of the Lysander, but I can't find a working one (the few that I can find out there are only static models). Is there a commercial airline that

currently uses such an airplane? A: I believe there was one in Air New Zealand in the early 2000s. From Wikipedia: The Lysander is a four-engine turboprop airliner designed and built by the now defunct Lysander Aircraft Company, based at Kirkwall Airport near Kirkwall, Orkney. With a notable history of over twenty-five years of service on Pacific routes, the last of the Twin Star Turbo-Lysander Series 1 aircraft was delivered to Air New Zealand in 2001 as NZ-LQD. This aircraft carried the registration ZK-NQK and was used on the Auckland-Wellington-Christchurch-Auckland route as the 38th Boeing 737-400QC.

Physicochemical properties of milk-derived nanostructured lipid carriers for parenteral delivery. This study analyzed the development and physicochemical properties of nanostructured lipid carriers (NLC) made from low-fat milk. NLC with tripalmitin as the solid lipid (STNP), oleic acid as the lipophilic phase, soybean phosphatidylcholine as the stabilizer, and different glycerol contents were prepared. The particle size, stability, morphology, and in vitro release of various drugs were evaluated. NLC preparation was simple and relatively reproducible. Phospholipid-coated nanoparticles with an average diameter of ~110 nm were formed by
