Homeland Security Dept Seeks Data From Facebook On Terrorism The US Department of Homeland Security is about to launch an online initiative in pursuit of information about alleged terrorists and terrorists' supporters. DHS, an acronym for Department of Homeland Security, unveiled a plan on November 8th to share intelligence through social networks, and is about to step into an information war concerning privacy. Soon the federal department, headed by current US President Barack Obama, will launch a new initiative aimed at tracking and investigating online information about terrorism. According to the Washington Post, the official announcement is scheduled for November 12th, just a day after Obama is back in the Oval Office. The initiative is called the Online Disruption and Interference (ODI) program. The Washington Post reports that the U.S. will ask bloggers, journalists and others to enlist in the program, and will be interested in the profiles they can collect. But this new program is also expected to use Facebook as its data collection arm, in conjunction with the National Security Agency and the FBI. The controversial online monitoring system has been made public in a statement dated November 8th and sent to the public on November 7th by US Secretary of Homeland Security Janet Napolitano. "This new program will be an exercise in participatory democracy and will provide a significant opportunity for the public to lend input and shape the nature of that input," the statement said. The statement noted that the government will aim to receive feedback on the conditions that we set for this program, which it called "nimble, agile and scalable," in order to ensure "more targeted information is being shared" with the government. "We will only receive public input on
