: East Markland In East Markland, climate change hides. It lurks beneath the surface, messing with the hearts and minds of those within because the effects and possibilities stay out of sight and way out of mind. Rain drips from tree leaves and water pooling in our gutters. The air is thick with the scent of felled trees and a sense of decay spread by a persistent wind that turns leaves to parchment and decays a harvest of long dead logs. The barrel of the forests takes the brunt of an only slowly growing cycle of ominous events which threatens a society that barely survives. Raindrops land on tongues the color of morbid bloodstained flesh and leach their salt long before they reach our mouths. It pours in as bodies and pressure, and the bloom of defrosted plants, choked by snow and ice, leaves a sweet aftertaste on thin liquid and thick sludge. The direction of time, disrupted by the poorly understood effects of long term changes, gazes into our era as if it could see us like an ancient and seer. Paths before that unknowing time bring only failure, surrender, and the inevitable slip to a darker and darker world as it scavenges. Only those with an immunity to its withering advances survive. Most cannot even see death because it has migrated elsewhere. Meat, meat, meat, so this is what our guts carry. This is what the rain leaves us with. All else is imagination. The science of that extra day, the time of year that officially, albeit so suddenly and so slow that it outruns most forward thinkers can step outside at 12 noon but instead wakes his dead at midnight, has become a means of restraint, a device that adds a subtle dimension to everyday life. It pervades as an invisible presence. When we refuse to reckon with it we become, we can do nothing but access a suppressed memory. Then we

We dream of that distant future that exists in a different time, beyond the realm of North America into an era before the wind, before the rain, ice, ocean, and the slope that in the process of becoming, eventually turns the entire landmass into one vast cemetery. We dream of a time when we can ride the gale of change with a smile on our lips rather than
