key? I'm writing a simple ruby program to get the value from a text file. This is what I use: `Dir.glob("*.txt").each do |f| value = read_from_file(f) puts value end` `read_from_file` is a method defined in `lib/read_from_file.rb` in my project. It works well when there is a "key" in the text file but if there's no key it returns an error in ruby's trace: `irb> read_from_file("../path/to/file/that/does/not/have/any.key")` `NameError: undefined local variable or method `key' for #` As I know if a file doesn't have a key, the programmer must add a "key" to the file. But in the case, the programmer doesn't add a "key" to the file, I want to handle that error. Is there a way to handle such error? A: Use `IO#[] = method: name = read_from_file("file") puts name.read def read_from_file(file) IO.read(file, 'rb') end` This will not raise error when the file does not contain key. This is probably a more advanced topic for this news group than it is for this news group, so I decided to make a.This invention relates to semi-aromatic polyester compositions and more particularly to reinforcing fillers and flame retardant materials in such polyesters. Polymeric materials have, in recent years, found an increasing variety of uses and a vast number of useful polymeric materials are now available. However, certain of these materials, such as polyvinyl chloride, polystyrene, etc., are characterized by certain undesirable properties which detract from their utility.

For example, certain materials of this type are not readily molded or otherwise formed into desired articles and are not readily colored and may require the use of special coatings and additives. Other materials have heretofore been used as flame retardant additives in these polymeric compositions. These include phosphorus, halogen, antimony and barium compounds as well as various salts and esters of metals such as antimony, bromine, calcium, magnesium, aluminum, zinc, cadmium, tin, etc. While many of these additives provide adequate flame retardant materials in some polymeric compositions, it is generally desirable to have a flame retardant composition which has the highest possible quantity of flame retardant additive. This quantity is desired since the presence of the flame retardant materials introduces such undesirable properties as color, smell, etc. In flame retardant materials, it is also desirable to maximize the amount of additive in the final product while at the same time minimizing the amount of a separate flame retardant material. For example, the presence of a separate flame retardant material not only adds to the cost of the final product, but also produces undesirable by-products in the polymerization process due to the difficulty of separation and removal of the additional flame retardant material. It is therefore desirable to minimize the amount of additional flame retardant material required in a given application. While certain materials are known to improve certain properties of certain polymeric compositions, such as polyvinylchloride, it is generally desirable to provide a flame retardant additive which
