It has a global impact on the health of patients. A more severe infection in the immunocompromised patient is invasive candidiasis. Currently, no other antigenemia test exists to detect the isolation and enumeration of Candida. The goal of Phase I is to develop the 1st molecular test capable of detecting the presence of Candida in fungemia patient specimens. Phase I devices, methods and procedures have been designed and formed for the development of a PCR chip that can detect the presence of Candida. The phase I devices and experimental procedures are designed to meet FDA guidelines such that the Phase II devices and methods can be developed in a safe environment without the issues of allergenicity and toxicity. Specifically, the aims of this application are to: 1. Design a chip capable of detecting Candida DNA in blood. The device will have a DNA detection area in the shape of a rectangle. It will have a blood collection chamber attached to the chip. The chamber will have an inlet for sample such as whole blood and an outlet for the entire blood volume. 2. Optimize the amplification reaction in the above chip. 3.

Execute a simulated clinical sample study and characterize the prototype device. 4. Produce the final test device. The use of a multiple-substrate system makes such systems simplistically easier to use and eliminates the need for transporting and handling of a single substrate for the entire test.
