Motion capture is conducted at the renowned Eindhoven-based MX Studios to recreate the intensity and speed of a real-life match. By utilizing FIFA-leading data on all the players' movements, the engine simulates the physics and interactions of the ball and player based on real-world footage. The result? It has been enhanced in FIFA 22 with the goal of creating more intuitive control. Control Intelligence gives a player a great deal of power when controlling their player: shooting, shooting at distance, corner kicking, controlling a player while in possession or making advanced passes. This means players can make pinpoint passes that reach their intended target with more accuracy. "The new Ball Physics deliver realistic speed and realistic bounce," said Craig Dunlop, FIFA Lead Engineer. "This allows us to create more dynamic moments that feel authentic and that will provide the FIFA players with more opportunities to score." The new control model also has improved responsiveness and responsiveness within the gameplay. A new 'Physical Intelligence' system uses motion capture to deliver a more realistic experience for both defenders and attackers. FIFA 22 will also feature new emotes, which can be triggered by a player's interactions with the ball. Better controls Every motion, interaction and decision requires player input. EA Sports has built on its long-standing tradition of remarkable player movement, addressing the core mechanics of FIFA on the cutting edge of motion capture technology.
