I don't consider myself a startup person. Well, I do. I'm a startup person who never gets around to implementing his ideas, which is probably a better way of saying that I'm not an entrepreneur. The truth is that I've left the startup world in the past to focus on content management and software development projects. While I'm deeply interested in startup ideas, I have spent my time in the last couple of years failing to get those visions going. Since I've been in the startup game before, I understand what it takes to make a business. But I still struggle to conceptualize the idea and execute it. One of the fun things about being in this particular camp is that I can lose myself in the goal of implementing my idea. I try to think about the problem I'm trying to solve from the user's perspective and the implications of the app. In the case of my app idea I imagine that one day I'll be installing the app on my own phone and then I start wondering what I should do next. From here you can imagine that I might slowly develop an app that does the things I want to do on my phone. But when I'm envisioning a startup from this perspective I don't know if I'm selling myself short. By the time I'm building the minimum viable
