Note To access Photoshop's help screen, either choose Help from the Help menu or press F1. ## Opening Photoshop Files Photoshop comes as an individual application or in the form of a "suite." In the case of the individual application, you can save an image using the Photoshop Save function. In the case of the suite, files are organized into several different folders or _library_ (File→Organize→In a Library); you choose the library to which you want to save an image. To open an image from a library, choose File→Open. Figure 2-9. Since the Library is really just a folder of images, you don't have to open folders to find them, and most are already open for your convenience. Here, a DSC_0009.JPG file is open, and the cursor is blinking at the top of the window, ready to open another file. ## Changing Workspace Views You can open Photoshop from either a _single-window_ mode or a _multi-window_ mode. A single-window mode is generally ideal for simple one-off image editing jobs, or if you're using Photoshop for the first time. In single-window mode, you can see all of the workspaces at once, and are never forced to work in a specific workspace. A multi-window mode, however, is the default and is the preferred mode for creating work. Since it's a multi-window mode, you can jump to a workspace or window and drag it to another window as you create the image. When you create new workspaces, you can always change the layout later if you need to (see Figure 2-10 and then zooming in to get a better view of your thumbnail \bottom\"). Figure 2-10. You can quickly see the characteristics of each workspace you're working in. You may think you're working in a single workspace, but Photoshop gives you the flexibility to create a second workspace without ever closing the first. NEW DELHI: Over 12 months ago, the Defence ministry had made it known that "paramount and non-derogable rights" enjoyed by armed forces personnel under Articles 19 and 21 of the Constitution would be protected, even if the Supreme Court pronounced the Armed Forces (Special Powers) Act (AFSPA) unconstitutional. This was also emphasised by the Prime Minister in his reply to the Rajya Sabha in December last year when the AFSPA was being considered for a debate. Now, the ministry has said it is preparing a "road map" for its action plan to enable the armed forces to take "institutional action" as directed by the Supreme Court, according to a TOI report. In the latest clue to the state of mind of the ministry and the armed forces, defence minister Manohar Parrikar has been directing his officials to do away with the Defence Services Headquarters (DSHQ) and instead build individual regional headquarters for each of the services, a euphemism for individual armoured corps for each of the three services, the report said. This will ensure better command and control of the forces and achieve a more strategic deployment. Sources said the defence minister has told his officials that this will be a major achievement of the Modi government. "The government is hopeful that it will be able to begin work this year on the establishment of the services' regional headquarters, a move which will please the public as the armed forces will also be bowing to the Supreme Court order," the report quoted a defence ministry source as saying. On January 17 last year, in a landmark judgement on AFSPA, the Supreme Court had struck down the Act, finding it violative of the principles of fundamental rights protected by the Constitution. In its judgement, the apex court had also made it clear that the armed forces can no longer claim immunity from law. The development has prompted the Ministry of Defence to work on a roadmap to implement the judgement. Last November, the ministry had stated that it was drawing up a "road map" for implementation, with a timeframe of three months. The government has said it will not "maintain a status quo" on the issue, but work through legal and constitutional avenues. It has also decided to go ahead with the August 2016 signing of the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) with the Indian Air Force, enabling the use of its Hindustan Aeronautics Limited (HAL) facility at Safdarjung for assembling Mirage 2000s and signing a new MoU on June 22. The development comes in

8 Benefits Of Spray Tanning It is now common among men to have a tan. It is perfectly acceptable to let a man wear a tan. If you are in this dilemma, you are not alone. Many women are more comfortable that men wear a tan even if there is a misconception that a man will more 'appear masculine' because he wears a tan. Many women think that it is discriminatory when a man has a tan because it is a feminine look. If you are interested in a man to think that you are more feminine or feminine, I think that you need to reexamine your expectations. My advice to you is that you need to establish what is important for you and start with that first before thinking of your partner. Find out what does he want? Is he concerned with what you want? Is he open-minded? Do you want him to understand you in more ways than just your body? Does he want to help you achieve your goals in life? Is he the man that you want to fulfill all your dreams and wants? The Good news is that he just might be the one that will do just that for you! How does a man feel about the color of your skin? That is a loaded question. It goes both ways. It also depends on how the man chooses to approach it. If the man is aware of the benefits of a spray tan and how a tan benefits his skin and personality, he will not object. A man will be able to see it as a beauty treatment, while a woman may find it be offensive. The point is that it is his choice as to how he goes about his tanning rituals. #1 Easy to maintain Having a tan is easy. A spray tanner can apply the tan in just a few minutes. It is so easy that it does not even require him to spend a lot of time on it. A man is not in a hurry. He can relax and enjoy this beauty ritual. If you desire a glow that lasts, a spray tan is your solution. However, we all know that having a tan is not a man's choice to have a tan. You also know that a tan can last for a few months or at least a couple of weeks. #2 Increased self-confidence A spray tan is not a sign of weakness. Having a tan is seen as a sign of strength and self-confidence. A man has the choice to
