Modulation of immunosuppressive serum factor(s) by lymphokines and its effect on natural killer cell-mediated cytotoxicity in mouse spleen. We have recently reported that serum from mice with a low responder to foot-pad inoculation of the methylcholanthrene-induced tumor C3H/HeJ myeloma induced a marked reduction of natural killer (NK) cell-mediated cytotoxicity. In this report we have studied the modulation of this serum-induced immunosuppressive effect by lymphokines in the serum. Several cytotoxic factor(s) were detected in the serum of these low responder mice by their ability to lyse antibody-coated target cells in the presence of complement. However, the cytotoxic activity of this serum could be blocked by the addition of purified lymphokines. Among them, lymphotoxin and interleukin-2 seemed to play important roles in the immunosuppressive effect, and macrophage-conditioned medium (M-CM) and partially purified lymphotoxin and interleukin-2 from M-CM had a similar effect to that of lymphokines. We concluded that lymphokines in the serum from the low responder mice were involved in the modulation of NK activity.

>This invention relates to a device for protecting cutters mounted at the ends of machine tool arms and particularly to cutters for boring holes for screw fasteners or, to be more general, for fasteners such as rivets, cotter pins, lock nuts, snap hooks, hook and loop fasteners, and the like. Such cutters comprise a body having a point or lancet at one end for forming the boring or hole in the material with which the fastener is engaged. Fastener material remains on the end of the cutter as the cutter is later removed from the fastener hole thereby to guard and retain the fastener. Such machines may be boring mills, milling machines, lathes, drill presses, and many other machines for cutting, boring, or reaming holes in workpieces. The problem with the use of such apparatus is that the tool-heads often break away from the tool-handles. When this occurs the tool-heads fall, as their material cannot be collected, to the floor,
