Rocksmith 2014 - All DLC's Song Pack V download patchProject Summary Major depression is one of the most widespread psychiatric disorders and is a leading cause of disability throughout the world, representing a major public health burden. Current pharmacological treatments for depression rely on medications that target monoaminergic neurotransmitter systems. However, depression is a heterogeneous disorder, with evidence for distributed changes in neural circuitry, which together account for the different symptoms, behaviors, and cognitive deficits of depression. Furthermore, while these treatments achieve improvement of depression symptoms, there is still a large unmet need for therapeutics that result in long-lasting benefits, and new treatments are desperately needed. Therefore, a major challenge is to identify and develop treatments that target multiple neurotransmitter systems, and improve the treatment response and remission in patients. The goal of this project is to develop and test novel therapeutics that target multiple neurotransmitter systems, using the biophysically-detailed stochastic single-neuron model (STELLA) in conjunction with the Neurobiology of Decision-Making (NDM) computational framework. Our model enables detailed molecular and cellular investigations, and has allowed us to show that many of the key abnormalities of depression occur at the level of decision-making. Using the model, our specific aims are to: 1) Develop a novel therapeutic, targeting 4 major neurotransmitter systems, using multiple neurotransmitter systems as a single unit; 2) Use the model to develop treatments that target multiple neurotransmitter systems to enhance the therapeutic effect, decrease latency to response and increase remission in a preclinical animal model of depression; 3) Use the model to develop a treatment that targets multiple neurotransmitter systems to enhance cognitive control in patients with depression. The proposed research will provide new treatments for depression that target multiple neurotransmitter systems and improve treatment response and remission in patients. Our findings will directly impact how depression is treated in a clinical setting, and will also facilitate further investigations into understanding the mechanism of action of antidepressant treatments.
