The concentrations of total cholesterol, triglycerides, and apolipoprotein (apo) A-I and apoB are routinely measured by automated immunochemical methods. However, these methods suffer from occasional significant intertest variability in apoA-I and lipid measurements. To investigate the intertest variability for apoA-I in a population sample, we compared the results from 5 automated immunochemical methods to the results from a reference high-performance liquid chromatographic (HPLC) method. The results from 23 fasting plasma samples were studied in a sequential 2-cycle (3-day) blood draw. Compared with the reference method, the RIA Apolipoprotein A-I Reference method, the two colorimetric methods, the Lipid-PAP and EL
