The endolymphatic sac (ES) plays an important role in the regulation of the physiological activities of the inner ear, particularly the vestibular end organs. The present investigation aimed to clarify how ES pressure affects the transmission of acoustic stimuli to and the firing of vestibular nerve fibers innervating the crista ampullaris (CA). Binaural electrocochleography was performed in chinchillas, in which the ES was microdissected unilaterally. The resting free-running potential (FRP) of the ipsilateral and contralateral CA as well as the evoked response to acoustic stimulation were measured before and after ES microdissection in anesthetized animals. Acoustic stimuli were delivered via a miniature earphone, and the single-fiber recording was performed from the ipsilateral or contralateral vestibular nerve. The postoperative FRP in the CA was increased following ES microdissection, especially in the ipsilateral CA. FRP recovery time in the CA was also significantly prolonged. Acoustic response threshold of the ipsilateral and contralateral vestibular nerve to the acoustic stimuli was increased following ES microdissection. The tinnitus-like sound elicited by the acoustic stimulation was recorded ipsilaterally but not contralaterally in the
