The answer is probably yes, and you can get some of the best.Q: Is there any way to get the Windows Error Reporting information for a missing.dll, using the MEF Export Attribute I am working on a WCF application (managed C#) and there is an issue with a single.dll. The.dll in question is the WCF Extensibility for Windows Runtime library and it is mandatory to install this.dll if you want to use some of the functionality of this library. However on a couple of machines (Windows 2012) the WCF Extensibility library is missing and therefore some of the functionality is not available. On the machine where the.dll was installed, a popup window displays an error saying: Missing or invalid registry information for.dll.. Please fix the problem by re-installing the DLL. Since the files are installed correctly I would like to use the Windows Error Reporting feature to get more info. I am using MEF to compose the aggregator. Is there any way of getting the Windows Error Reporting information for a missing.dll? A: -Then I tested it on the Windows Server 2012. I haven't found any issues. To examine whether sexual communication between the cat and the male is a reliable indicator of the female's fertility;

to identify factors that affect transovarial transmission of the oocyte; and to determine whether transovarial transmission results in a measurable impact on the offspring. Prospective in vivo study. Twenty-four sexually experienced, aged queens and 11 castrated cats. Twenty-four queens were exposed to the males for 4 minutes on 3 days, and the cats were sedated and semen was collected. All queens were ovariectomized and were randomly allocated to 1 of 3 experimental groups. The queens' ovaries and the oocytes produced were surgically removed after 5 to 7 days, and fertilization (oocyte survival, diplotene oocyte stage) and fertilization rate (cumulus penetration, pronuclear formation) were recorded. The cats were exposed to the queens for 1 hour on 1 or 2 days, and in semen collection trials, 9 queens were ovariectomized and the oocytes produced were recovered for assessment of fertilization rate. Fertilization and diplotene oocyte stages were the same in ovary-intact queens that had their ovaries removed and in cats that had their testes removed. Nonfertile cat ejaculates ($n = 3$) had poor fertilization rates (1.2%, 1.2%, and 0%) and did not result in pregnancy in the queens that were exposed to them. The cats exposed to the queens in semen collection trials ($n = 23$) had a mean (\pm SD) ejaculate fertilization rate of 40.6% \pm 9.6%, a diplotene oocyte stage of 65.0% \pm 11.3%, a fertilization rate similar to those observed in cats inseminated with fertile cat semen, and a pregnancy rate of 10.8% +/- 9.9%. Transovarial transmission of the oocyte is a reliable indicator of queen fertility, and is unaffected by surgical removal of the queen's ovary or reproductive tract. In semen collection trials, a high proportion of ejaculates are fertilized 6d1f23a050
