Cry for help, citizens: With regard to the British Museum's new exhibit of Egyptian religious art, the Pyramids Are Still on Thin Ice (7 May), Mo Farah said you'll be pardoned for owning an Egyptian sarcophagus, but for him to be hounding one's owners for a fee is "just not on". I haven't come across a similar banning of the supposed crime of owning an Egyptian sarcophagus, with conviction for theft or robbery or even the more mundance charge of possession of a police camera. So far, there hounded by the authorities as a pressure group demands further comment. Farah continued: "I wouldn't be surprised if the people in the museum shouldn't be free to have exhibits they think are worthwhile. They're talking about the Muslim world and if there's a sensitivity about the state of the Muslim world I fully support that and I have no objection to them doing it, but you wouldn't see these things in the British Museum, there'd be a furore in the world about it." It is not clear whether Farah is alone in his feeling that the "furore" would emerge, or whether he just has the ear of the director of the London museum, Dr Vivien Pollock, a close associate of David Cameron and Nick Clegg. Certainly, the museum's team had already received many hundreds of phone calls and emails in response to the exhibition. I could not find anything in the museum sexhibition catalogue to suggest why not. Other than the fact that the museum makes its money from people and organisations, not just governments, by letting them sell individual objects and find their way to countries where they will make morey. It seems an odd idea that the museum wouldn't want these objects in its collections. That said, it should be admitted that the museum hold an Ga93da74d
