in most cases, the computer or file you're trying to get into is full of viruses and other malware that will affect your phone or other personal device. a hacker's goal is to trick you into running malware on your device in order to gain access to your data, or to gain access to the computer itself. you may not even realize you're infected because of the way malware works. it tends to hide in your device until you are specifically trying to use it. or it may stop working altogether until you're connected to the internet. there are a number of ways hackers can gain access to your phone or other personal device. the most common is via malicious applications, which are apps that can infect your device. other methods include insecure wi-fi networks, or non-encrypted data, which can be sniffed by hackers. for example, many vpns provide their users with their login credentials in the clear, while only hiding the ip address of the device that's connecting. this is so that the vpn provider won't have to maintain a list of users' ip addresses, which could potentially be used to track their usage. but because many people use a vpn because they want to keep their ip address hidden from hackers, and because the ip address is what a hacker needs to track you, this exposes you to other attacks. the gray hat hacker isn't so much about improving security as it is about circumventing it by using sneaky methods and techniques. they're the ones who post software fixes online, not for the benefit of the software's maker, but to steal another person's identity, or infect computer networks with viruses or malware.
