The exercise ECG should be evaluated in relation to the posttest clinical outcome, including cardiac death and nonfatal MI. A valid exercise ECG should display a positive ischemic response at the time of exercise or at the peak of the electrocardiographic ST segment. 110 A positive stress test for ischemia is indicated by the presence of a local or generalized ischemic response 113 and is believed to be associated with a long-term benefit from revascularization strategies, including angioplasty and coronary bypass grafting. Exercise testing can also identify differences between an individual's response to exercise. The myocardial oxygen reserve at peak exercise, for example, has been shown to be a strong predictor of subsequent cardiac event rate among patients with CAD. 62 The protocols of exercise testing are similar in patients with established ischemic heart disease and in individuals with suspected or known CAD, because exercise tests are used to detect the presence of CAD or to aid in the assessment of its severity and extent.

The fundamental components of exercise testing include ECG recording, blood pressure measurement, oxygen consumption, and exercise termination criteria. In addition, tests for other facets of cardiovascular function that may be altered in CAD include cardiac catheterization, measurement of ventricular volumes and ejection fraction by cardiac magnetic resonance imaging, and evaluation of vascular compliance and peripheral blood flow by central venous pressure measurement. 31,63
