q: how to fix this xcode error? i am trying to run an app on my ios device, i've created the app on xcode 4.3.2, but whenever i try to run the app on my device it says a property of a mismatched type: int32 on object of type NSMutableArray in json" can someone help me with this error? a: i had the same error. my app was working fine until i upgraded to xcode 4.2. i removed my app from the device and then went back to 4.1 and everything worked fine. a: if you have this error in the console, it is due to the fact that an array was added to an NSMutableArray but was not initialized. in my case, i had an array that was declared in one of my classes and used in other classes. i was trying to add the array to the NSMutableArray before calling a function that was adding an object to the array. the problem was that the array was nil. i was actually getting an error due to a misplaced bracket. my problem was fixed when i added an object to the array in the function that the error was being thrown in, and then later added the array to the NSMutableArray.

q: linkers in c++ i am new to c++ and what i understand is there are pre-defined libraries like cmath or cstdio. these libraries are usually provided with the compiler in the form of libraries. i am confused about linkers. why is it necessary to use a linker? suppose i have a program in c++, what is the need of linking? i understand that when we compile a program the compiler generates.o files that contain the binary code. now when we run the program we again have to use a linker to combine the binary code from.o files. what is the need of linking? i mean, a linker is used to combine the binary code from. a: a linker is a program that combines all the object files and other libraries you've built into one big binary program. if you didn't use a linker, then you'd have to type each.
