toad for oracle base can be used by all users of toad for oracle, whether they use oracle express or instant client. toad for oracle base also offers a set of features that are not available in toad for oracle. you can find out more about these features in the toad for oracle base manual. before you are able to use toad for oracle, you need to create an oracle user account for your user. an oracle user account will allow you to connect to the database from oracle gui client (tnsname) or the oracle enterprise manager database control. in addition to the user-created database, you also need to create a tns alias to connect to the database from your workstation. for example, if you created a database on the following host: (oracle express for windows) or (oracle express for linux), you will need to create an alias named (oracle express for windows) or (oracle express for linux) in the following format: toad 12.5 and earlier only supported 64-bit windows. while this may not seem like a huge limitation at first, it does require developers to have a 32-bit version of java installed in order to use toad. while oracle provides 64-bit versions of java for all supported platforms, it is recommended to install a 32-bit version of java. in other words, you need to choose one of the following 32-bit versions of java to install: java se 8 update 132 or java se 7 update 45 or java se 6 update 24. the data files are contained in the directory c:\program files (x86)\oracle\toad for oracle\12.1\data\version12\toad. the basic instructions are as follows: after opening the toad installer, browse to the installation directory and choose the.exe file.
