From a different perspective: this new drop-down menu feature lets you get your hands on the controls of a specific filter, but without a mouse cursor. Now you can select a range tone curve to quickly create a new filter for a selective range of tones on the image. This feature is specially created for use with the Efex Pro 6 Filter Browser app. With selective colour correction, you can change the hue, saturation, and brightness for a specific set of colours. It also includes a new Contours feature that lets you easily remove unwanted contours, such as things that have been painted on a background. When working with your images, you may need to change the size of the image to look fit a specific area or need to resize an image. With Smart Guides, you can quickly resize images based on their context. Another useful feature is that you can now use the Place a New Layer feature that lets you place a pre-defined layer, like the Background layer, at a specific location on an image. You can use this to quickly place a pre-defined background every time. Let's face it, customer service at Adobe is awful. That's probably not the case for everyone, but it's the way it's treated in my experience. Emailing or calling has no way to make an appointment or order a product. You have to create a support ticket to make a reservation for a call or have a human read and listen to you in order to get your problem resolved. There's no option to just call or chat without being put on hold for minutes-long automated queues, nor of course is there any real chance you'll get an answer from someone who's not a support screener. What's that you say? You want an appointment? Do you want a different time? Like a week or more in advance? I don't think so. That's what makes it so bad.
