The goal of this study was to compare the economic burden of CVD for African Americans and Caucasians in the US. As a secondary objective, it aimed to determine whether income, sex or age had a larger impact on the cost of these disease states. The data used in the analysis were obtained from the 2000 Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System and the National Health Interview Survey. There was a statistically significant difference in age between African Americans and Caucasians but not in income, prevalence or morbidity. There was also a significant difference between the two cohorts in the proportion of their income spent on each medical condition. Although African Americans had a higher prevalence of CVD than Caucasians, they accounted for a lesser percentage of the total expenditure on the disease because their average amount of income spent on CVD was lower. Gender did not affect the amount of income spent on disease condition in either cohort. Despite a higher prevalence of CVD among African Americans, they spent on average lower percentages of their income on the condition. This leads to the hypothesis that lack of health insurance and lower income levels contribute to the higher rate of CVD among this group. Research is needed to determine the relative impact of income, sex, and age on the incidence and prevalence of CVD.
