Great app design and has been consistently good over the years. With the latest release of Elements, Adobe has made the advances in color management and intelligent workflows (smart brushes, smart curves and now smart lenses) truly shine. One of the biggest changes for me, as a longtime user of Photoshop's Make Mask layers feature, is that the planning of the changes was done in the new place Adobe refers to as "The Creative Canvas". Layers can be moved around, and all edits are carried out without the need to go back to the Lumen module. For all its new features, Lightroom has an equally intuitive interface. And, within the Lightroom interface is the ability to have Photoshop Layers that actually behave like one. So something as simple as dragging and dropping an image into a collection will do just that. The blend modes remain as in previous versions; however, changes are now made in a panel on the right side which is more easily seen, especially with the advent of more complicated resizing and modifying tools. Overall, however, I think that Lightroom is as equally impressive as the new Photoshop CC or Elements 2018, as far as its features are concerned. One of the best touches of the new Photoshop CC is the new organization of the Navigation Bar. This is one of the first tabbed editors, and it makes the screen to navigate so much easier to do. To create a group of images, click on the "Layer Settings" in the Application Bar (don't forget to double-click on the "Layers" tab). Now click on "OK" to create a new "Group" for those images. You can create new groups without closing the image you are working on, or, at the very least, continue to work without you having to "Save" or "Close" every time. You may want to use the new "Save" or "Save as" function to name your group, or even a new project to make it easy to organize your work. Perhaps one of the hardest things I learned to do was having to name each of my layers. Now it's second nature with the in-camera naming, especially if you've named the layers in the previous image. Another trick of Photoshop CC's is that if you have a picture open, and want to change a setting, for Example: you want the curves to be more in the shadows, then simply work on a new layer, by heading to Layer Settings and outlined "Curves". Once there, you'll see a slider for Curves with the Center and the Limits. Move these to either the Shadows or the Highlights, and those settings will be change to the ones you desire.
