And just as Blondie had announced his presence, the room quieted down. There had been a moment of hushed awe, when everyone knew that the Master was there. And then it was relaxed again, and minds turned to the conversation already underway. Arundel was a good topic of conversation, but the days were passing and the ambassador knew that the Court was waiting for something more. "You are thoughtful, sir," said Jasmine, watching Allie's eyes. "You would like to know all about him, would you not? Well, what is there not to know? The Prince is a good man; kind, brave, thoughtful, his ideas well-thought-out and his sense of duty great." "You are a woman of undoubted charm and perceptivity, Mademoiselle," said Allie in a low voice. "I will confess that even I have not yet begun to discover the full extent of your talents. You came here to France, as a young woman. Was it by the way of your own choice?" "Not at all. We were in an army together in England; we married in the same year. I did not know you then, but you were a friend of the family then. You see, I was not in the same position as you; I could not leave him, even if I wished to. Whatever I may think of the man now, if he had been a good man then, I would still have had to do it." "So you admire him; you respect him?" "I revere him. We fought a losing battle against him; we were all beaten. So what is the use of fighting a losing battle when you know it is useless?" "Does he... does he know?" asked Alf
