Using the Adobe Stock app, you can buy images of commercial quality from a growing collection from a pool of available stock photos. I've found that there's a need to fine-tune the selection of what images you get when you're browsing, since, most likely, you're not going to print a 24 x 36 image from the instant you see it. So, if you're going to use the same images from this app, it's a good idea to download them before going to step 2 below. Around $600 worth of movies (roughly, around $5.00 for each 30 minute clip), you can buy from a growing collection of over 30,000 stock Blu-rays you can use for your own projects. In fact, you can even buy parts of a movie in sections. Lightroom 5 includes new editing tools, most of which are geared towards holiday albums and other projects involving several images. There are options for cropping, resizing, lighting, and coloring. Other features include enhanced export options and an improved Design panel. One-Click Image-Edit is the most interesting feature introduced in this update. It's a feature that lets you batch-edit multiple photos without having to manually click them one-by-one. Instead, you work with smart collections that exclude other images. You can select one or more objects in an image, make sure the Up or Down button is activated, and drag selection borders to create the removal (if you have more photos selected, multiple modifications can be made at once); you can add or delete images; and you can auto-grace your photos. The new grouping in this version of Lightroom 5 has been retranslated, so the stars are not "stacked" anymore. This feature also supports Lightroom 4 databases. The downside to this feature is that it is not designed to be used with an iPad. Another downside is that it is currently in beta.
