Adobe has announced new features in its yearly MAX, enabling users to import edited files into Lightroom for synchronizing. This means you don't have to register all your images on Creative Cloud to utilize this feature. The new operation lets you add edited files to the Lightroom library of files, which in turn can be shared and then accessed online from other computers, or synced to devices that use the application. Admittedly, this capability could have been integrated earlier, but it does show the quality of Lightroom and the thoroughness of Adobe's software development. Highlights include the initial release of Adobe Live Trigger (ALT) features, a capability first introduced in Lightroom 5. In turn, the capability's syncing and integration make the tool both easier to use and more dependable. I'll talk more about the Live Trigger later in this article. The other highlights are a new ability to make a complex selection without losing part of it (even if you accidentally leave out a selection), and the ability to reverse individual selection and blend modes, which serves to clear objects from a shot that were inadvertently included. Automatic art corrections are more practical than the manual ones of the past. Though you can tell which adjustments are most useful, you can't tell which ones to leave—yet another reason why some users prefer to use manual corrections. Interacting with the world of different media files beyond images is another key component of Photoshop. A feature that worked well before, the Content-Aware Move tool in this version does exactly what its name indicates.

Creating usable pipelines isn't always a matter of initializing every asset at the time of import, but rather it's a matter of managing the time and objects that are important to keep. By using file sorting, an automator tool called Categories, and the built-in Exported or Installed flag, you can create a context for responsive design: keep the files you need for the project, and move everything else to a "archive" folder that is unchecked so that when the project is exported you can selectively recreate the files. A simple way to think of this is, do all your local edits, import them into Lightroom, and export them. In theory, this is governed by the fact that when a project is imported, the web projects' templates are applied to the document. Thus, changing the template in one document can change the dates on all by being applied to all. Also, individually edited text elements will sometimes retain their formatting, making them very difficult to remove unless they've been chain-linked. This functionality allows you to also create and manage a group of projects, as well as assign a unique icon and frame to each project. It also allows you to do a straight import as a master file, like a duplicate of the original and duplicate all of the individual documents at that time. This workflow allows you to track the original documents and work that was done using the individual documents. It is vital to have every document accounted for as this can be a long and tedious process. e3d0a04c9c
