As mentioned, I downloaded one of the available trial versions of Lightroom 5 as I was writing this review. I had no issues patching it to the latest version (just update according to the previous steps), and I did not run into any issues with this. As the release notes for Lightroom 5 point out, many of the issues of Lightroom 4.3 have been fixed thanks to customer feedback. I will certainly try a later version of Lightroom, if there are no show-stopping bugs found in Lightroom 5. The only bug I encountered was a “rapidly disappearing” issue when sharing images in Lightroom 4.3. Simply creating a new version of the image for sharing fixed the issue. My last gripe is about the advanced exposure adjustment dialog. It used to be a simple thing -- click on the exposure settings and the image would update with the changes. No more: now there is another preview in the upper left corner which stays the same as you adjust settings. This preview doesn't distinguish the current exposure nor does it update automatically - I just had to wait a few seconds until Lightroom updated the preview. This is a small thing, but it's annoying. However, this is a very minor gripe, so I'll move on. Custom brushes are now stored inside the recently-installed brushes folder. The filter brush and the gradient stamp brushes are gone from this folder. If you find it ultra-important to keep these brushes somewhere else, they can still be found in Lightroom's Library module. I am not sure why the placement of brushes is changing. Lightroom's "Import From Lightroom Settings" option from Lightroom 4.3 is now also called "Import as Library". The workflow of this option is simpler than before.
