“Motion capture data is an excellent tool to capture the nuance of player movement in motion. It's one of the best ways to instantly bring joy to players around the world,” said Adrian Kempe, senior gameplay designer on FIFA. “We are excited to provide an authentic football experience with the addition of HyperMotion technology.” The first iteration of “HyperMotion” will be powered by the technology implemented in FIFA 19, and also includes refinements to the ball handling system and offensive skill controls. New animation work has been added to deliver more natural player movement for skilled players. Here's a quick FAQ for the new feature: What is the HyperMotion technology? The most recent technology used for FIFA is the "Fluid Move" (or Accel Motion). This allows FIFA to make realistic movements, but it has a few drawbacks. For example, the player models don't easily move during "tackles," and it's not as realistic as the player models moving in real-life. The new HyperMotion technology will use real-life motion captured data to deliver an improved realism, better animations and a more natural movement. What is the difference between HyperMotion and Fluid Motion? Although they are similar, the HyperMotion technology makes more natural and realistic movements. The full difference is that the new technology uses motion capture data to evaluate where and when the player is going to move, and it actually evaluates the movement of the player in real-life. It's like watching a digital avatar move in real-life. The Fluid Motion on the other hand, is just digital version of how the player moves, but in HyperMotion, the player actually moves in real-life. How will the ball move in real-life when the new technology is used? The ball will move in real-life in the same way that the ball moves in FIFA 19: it will have extra velocity when in front of the player, and slows down when the player is running towards the ball. What will happen when a player catches a ball and moves towards the opponent with HyperMotion? The player's feet will now accelerate backwards when going towards the opponent after they catch the ball. This will give the player better control of the ball when going towards an opponent. How will passes work? When crossing, a quicker pass will be
