Accurately measuring small working ranges of motion is one of the major challenges in prosthetic limb design. This measurement is required to properly place the mechanical components of the prosthetic device. This is because, as is well known, a prosthetic device must be sized to ensure proper fit (or "on/off") for the amputee. However, this same sizing constraint may be more problematic for persons without a limb. That is, because prosthetic devices for persons without limbs are typically sized to fit the anatomy and movement of the body and the degree of amputation, a prosthetic device size change may result in the person with a missing limb being either too bulky or too small for the prosthetic device. Therefore, there is a need in the art for the ability to sense a person's limb movement for the purposes of measuring the person's limb and sizing the prosthetic device. There are multiple benefits of being born a woman. We're born with XX chromosomes, of course, and at puberty, the female form begins to develop and mature. Then there's the fact that our brains are built to order. We're great at math and science. Our bodies store lots of fat while others make use of it to keep us warm. Our endocrine system regulates moods, reproduction and digestion. These are just a few of the things that make us women, but there's another, even better reason we need to hold on to our XX chromosomes: The Y chromosome helps ensure our survival. This is due to the fact that our Y chromosome is a genetic "couple" to our X chromosome, which gives us the majority of our red blood cells, immune system, brain and sexual organs. No longer.
