Crysis 3 Crack [Loki].Q: Sample size effect on training set's convergence If i have a neural net which have 5 input features and 1 output feature (sigmoid), and if i have 20% of samples in the training set (if it was binary classification), i want to know what will happen if i try to change the sample size of the training set. Will the training set will converge? A: It is not very clear what you mean by "change the sample size" and "converge". One possibility is that you are training a classifier, and change the sample size (or possibly the proportion of the target class) as you collect more data. If you have a training set of 20% of the full population (which seems rather odd, if i understand your question correctly), then your new "training set" will still have 20% of the full population. Thus, you should expect your model to match 20% of your population. Further, since your are training a classification model, you can expect the performance of the model to match the population's performance, up to the random fluctuations that come with any training. Alternatively, if you are just trying to figure out how well you can expect your model to generalize on your training set, then you need to choose a level of performance you want to achieve. For instance, you may want to aim for a 20%-classification error on your training set, if your target is "invisible" to you at a level of 10% error. In that case, if you have a training set of 20% of the full population, you can expect your model to have a 20%-classification error, i.e., the model that works best on your training set will
