I'd rather have that than a system where the political body defining our norms is controlled by a relative handful of special interests, i.e., the banks, the energy companies, the pharmaceutical companies, and the like. (At least you will have a polite society if the oil corporations have their way.) But a system where the Fed is able to control the political process is likely to be more rapacious, more hyper-aggressive, and more insistent on total victory than anything we have ever seen, because the Fed knows that it can't be constrained. Indeed, its power to do and undo is like that of the most powerful monarch that ever lived. So for the next 50 years, as the Fed displaces the political parties as the primary engine of American politics, it's more likely than not that democracy in this country will be killed by democracy. I heard a quote from comedian George Carlin recently: "If you tell a joke, and you know it's a stupid joke, you don't tell that joke. You find another one that's not as stupid. Because if you tell the stupid joke, you're actually implying that you agree with that joke. And if you agree with it, you're an idiot. And if you're an idiot, society doesn't need you." America needs its grumpy old men and wizened old women, and the nation needs them to tell all of its stupid jokes. More importantly, the nation needs them to speak up when they hear jokes that aren't so stupid, and that they don't accept. And we need them to tell the joke tellers when they break some sort of unwritten rule that the rest of us expect them to follow, and also that we do not accept. Grumpy old men and wizened old women need to tell each other jokes, and then others should do the same.
