!(glaskowmedj75328-0043){#sp6.24} The attraction of the multi-disciplinary movement health program in general practice. A qualitative study of the year of work. The objective of this study was to explore general practitioners' (GPs') attraction to and continuation of a practice-oriented, clinically based, multidisciplinary movement health program within their own general practice setting. Qualitative interviews were held with a sample of 11 GPs practicing in Melbourne, Australia. Thematic analysis was used to analyse interview data and categories and themes were derived in a process of inductive and deductive analysis. GPs described the program as a setting that was practice-based, clinically led, problem focused, and provided a strong connection with their patients. The program also permitted GPs to meet patients' and peers' expectations and expectations of specialists. In addition to meeting patients' expectations, the program demonstrated good retention over the program's first three years. GPs considered that they obtained knowledge and skills of value for their patients which positively impacted on their practice. GPs identified areas in need of improvements including patient access to the program. The study's findings support the view that programs can be of value to GPs' own practice. However, further research is
